‘Bullying is soul-destroying’

Tamanna Miah is 22 and in her third year at university, but still carries the emotional and physical scars from the racial bullying she suffered throughout primary and secondary school. Her family are from Bangladesh and she grew up in Sevenoaks, Kent, where she was the only non-white child in her primary school. The bullying started almost as soon as she began school, she says, around the age of four.

Tamanna Miah says she was bullied from the time she started primary school onwards. 'They did everything to make my life hell.'

"I was the only Asian kid in my area and in my school. People used to bully me for my looks, my skin colour ... they did everything to make my life hell. They called me names, put sticks and rubbish and chewing gum in my hair.

"They would chase me and throw things at me. They pushed me off a wall. Even today I've still got the marks on my leg from when that happened.

Miah was so unhappy at school her parents had to drive her there "kicking and screaming"; she would pretend to be ill and try to hide to avoid going to school. She began to lose confidence in the way she looked and used her mother's skin products to try to lighten her skin so she would "fit in" with her peers.

Bullying has changed her life, she says. "It's soul-destroying, it really is. I know how much I suffered and I wouldn't want anyone else to go through it. I suffered severe depression and anxiety as a result. I was so isolated.

"I had no confidence, I had no self-esteem. I couldn't talk to my parents and my teachers didn't understand. I wanted to suicide a lot of the time."
